Private rooms at luxury prices

by Melinda Wittstock

Students checking in at McGill motels are charged higher rates than at any other on the Canadian university strip.

Residence fees at McGill are the highest in Canada.

Residences at Bishops, Carleton, Western and the University of British Columbia (UBC) not only have much lower costs, but also provide more services. These universities also offer students more choices about which services they pay for.

The meal plans at these universities are not mandatory and the students can choose either single or double rooms.

At McGill, only single rooms, more costly than doubles, are offered. Meal plans at McGill residences are mandatory.

Students in the co-ed residences here pay $2,910 for their room and board. At RVC, a women's residence, students pay $3,760. RVC's fees are, approximately $1,000 more expensive than other universities' residences offering the same services.

RVC has 24-hour security, a seven-day meal plan and a weekly linen service. These services account for the difference in price between the co-ed residences and RVC.

At UBC, a single room with the meal plan costs $2,691 to $2,761. Without the meal plan, students pay approximately $1,000 less. Students at UBC can also opt for the less expensive double rooms. With the meal plan, students in double rooms pay $300 - $400 less than they would in single rooms. Students in double rooms and avoid residence food pay $1,456.

Carleton students pay $2,087 for a double room and $2,277 for a single. Meal plans are mandatory. At Bishops, room and board is $2,500.

Western students pay between $2,115 and $2,457 for their room and board. They can also choose between one bedroom apartments, which range from $215 to $257 a month, and two bedroom apartments, which range from $268 to $293 a month.

Why does McGill charge higher rates?

According to the Director of Residences, Flo Tracy, most of the excess costs can be attributed to the high labour costs in Québec, which has the highest minimum wage of all the Canadian provinces. Bishops University, also located in Québec, however, has lower residence fees than McGill

Bureaucrats impede birth control co-op

by Paula Slepniwicz

McGill's first birth control co-operative was scheduled to open Jan. 10, but bureaucratic problems are putting the establishment of the co-op in question.

The Women's Union initiated the idea to open the co-op last spring. Since that time they have collaborated with the Head and Hands Youth Clinic and McGill Health Services, and also have solicited the support and guidance of professors at the School of Social Social work.

According to Liz Harper, one of the organisers of the project, the Women's Unions' main objectives in trying to establish the clinic are to provide McGill students with contraceptive information, counselling and referrals, inexpensive birth control devices, and a forum where students can openly discuss birth control.

The co-op will stock creams, jellies, safes, diaphragms (with prescription) and applicators — at one half to two thirds the retail price.

"The co-op is a means by which women can begin to take control of their own health and life, without the negative influence of profits of pharmaceutical companies and with the availability of accurate and accessible information in counselling," said Harper. "This may be the beginning of a movement advocating free birth control as they have in Britain."

Harper is a Social Work student doing her placement work through the Women's Union. If the co-op is established, she will be providing birth control counselling to McGill women and men.

Since approaching the Students' Society Comptroller of Finance Jon Shifman to open a separate account for the co-op, the Women's Union has had trouble convincing Students' Society executive members and management that the project is legal, practical, and necessary.

A Students' Society executive meeting approved the project in principle, but they not yet given the Women's Union permission to open the co-op.

"The reason it is taking such a long time is that there are a number of concerns, particularly legal concerns, which must be dealt with," said Bruce Hicks, vice-president internal.

Hicks is concerned that impregnated women who have used the co-op might hold either Students' Society or the Women's Union responsible and sue.

The Women's Union has attempted to alleviate Hicks' and Shifman's concerns through the Strike will shake P.Q.

Québec unions are preparing to break the law and win. Common Front unions are calling for an unlimited general strike at the end of this month. The government has already declared any strike action illegal, threatening dark consequences for hospital workers who dare to defy them.

The Québec government appears to be criminalising union activity it doesn't approve of. Both the Montréal transport unions and the Common Front negotiators (Yvon Charbonneau, Claude Salois and Jeanne-Francois Murin) appeared in court on Monday facing charges of leading an illegal strike last November 9.

The one-day strike was the first action in the public sector union campaign against the Québec government's threatened imposition of 20 per cent wage cuts and new working conditions for over 200,000 public workers.

The threat has materialized: the government have suspended the public sector's right to strike until 1985.

"Forty-three per cent of the meal plan's cost goes to labour, 40 per cent to food costs and 17 per cent to overhead," she said.

John Southin, McConnell Hall Residence Director and McGill Science Professor, said, "Service salaries tied with labour unions are negotiated on a comparable basis with similar public service jobs."

Will the fees be higher next year because of inflation?

According to Tracy, "Our budget works within the guidelines of inflation and depends upon the current Statistics Canada projections."

This year's residence costs increased significantly from the 1981/82 figures. RVC's costs rose by 16.5 per cent, Douglas Hall by 15.75 per cent, and the co-ed residences by 14.25 per cent. Canada's inflation rate last year at this time was 12 to 13 per cent.

support and assurances of other organisations.

Dr. Rich, the new director of McGill Health Services, stated in a letter to Shifman that Health Services would take official responsibility for the project and would act as resource people for the co-op.

The Women's Union has also solicited the support from the Head and Hands clinic, who, because of the necessity to order contraceptive devices in bulk, have agreed to add the Women's Union orders to their own.

The Women's Union has also solicited legal counsel and have been assured that the project is legal.

According to the President of the Women's Union, Dolores

Vader, "I think they (Students' Society) see the co-op as a money making venture, which is totally contradictory to our main purpose: to offer both women and men more accessible, less expensive contraceptive devices. Even those who don't usually frequent the Women's Union will be prompted to come up and use the co-op," said the President of the Women's Union, Dolores Vader.

Commented Harper, "I think this situation proves that the only way groups like the Women's Union can be truly effective is to be autonomous, to be funded from outside Students' Society. It's a problem being a women's group within an institution."

The Students' Society Executive decide tonight whether the co-op should be established.

...taxi racism inquiry Friday

The inquiry follows incidents last summer when the situation erupted and Montréal newspapers were splashed with accusations of racist behavior on the part of taxi operators towards their Haitian employees.

The Québec Human Rights Commission (QHRC), the government body responsible for investigating violations of human rights, has been accused of ineffectiveness in dealing with the case by various private interest groups.

One such group, the Afro-Asian Foundation of Canada (AAFC), organised a demonstration outside the offices of the QHRC at the height of the controversy last summer. But the AAFC is not expecting a conclusive outcome to the inquiry.

"This is just a farce...a piece of political propaganda advanced by the government to satisfy minorities that something is being done on their behalf," said Sebastian Alakutusery, Chairman of the foundation.

Alakutusery feels that basic changes will have to be made not only to the QHRC but also to the Quebec Charter of Human Rights before the face of racism in Quebec is changed.

"Some of the clauses in the Charter will have to be changed," affirmed Alakutusery, "and just the fact that the inquiry is being held in French is evidence enough that minorities, 80% of whom speak English, are not considered seriously here in Québec."

The League for Rights and Liberty, an independent group which has compiled a dossier on racism in the taxi industry, echoes some of Alakutusery's criticisms of the QHRC.

"The QHRC has known about the situation for a few years but has been very slow to react" said Lorraine Desjardins, the person responsible for compiling the dossier.

The Daily made phone calls to three taxi companies while researching this article. The companies were chosen at random from the Montréal telephone directory and were specifically requested not to send a Haitian driver.

The companies contacted, Lasalle, Moderne and Beau-bien, all complied with the request.

Moving to McGill strike end of Jan

by David Schulze

Four hundred employees at McGill and staff at most of the hospitals affiliated with McGill may soon be on an illegal strike.

At the university the strike could close the residence cafeterias, the Faculty Club, Computing Centre, the Physical Plant, Printing Services, and put an end to maintenance work. It would also shut down the following hospitals where McGill medical students are taught: the Royal Victoria, the Jewish General, the Lakeshore General, the Montréal Chest Hospital, the Queen Elizabeth, the Reddy Memorial, and the Pavillon Alexandra of the Montréal General.

Classes may be cancelled if professors choose to respect the picket lines.

McGill's non-academic staff represented by the Service Employees Union-Local 298 of the Québec Federation of Labour (FTQ) is waiting for the executive to decide whether or not to join the Common Front of Québec government employees (FTQ), the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN) and the Centrale de l'enseignement du Québec (CEQ) in an unlimited and illegal general strike beginning January 26.

A member of Local 298's negotiating team told the Daily he expected a strike to be announced this week. The members gave the executive a mandate to strike in a vote held in November 1982.

Non-medical hospital workers in the Fédération des affaires sociales (CSN) and the nurses' unions will probably take part in new strike votes shortly to decide their participation.

The unions are protesting the Québec government's Bill 70 which arbitrarily reduced wages by 19 per cent for three months as of December 1, 1982 for unionized university workers and as of January 1 for public sector workers. Bill 70 also extends for those three months contracts that would otherwise have expired and makes strikes illegal during that period.

The government implemented the bill after unsuccessful negotiations between the government and the Common Front, when the government asked the unions to agree to wage cuts to reduce Québec's $3 billion deficit.

University workers were affected even though they negotiate separately, with university administrations, and are not technically public employees, nor will the universities save any money through the wage cuts (savings will go directly to the government).

Labour Notes

The union leaders face possible prison sentences and fines of $50,000 each for their participation in the November 9 action.

In November and early December the Common Front unions spent days locked up in Québec City in intensive negotiation sessions with the government. The unions have desperately backed down on their original wage demands. The teachers union, the CEQ, stated they were willing to accept a wage freeze. They might even accept the reductions if promised job security and if the savings from the cuts are used to create new jobs.

In effect the unions have been reduced to one demand so moderate that even the editorialists of the Montréal Gazette can support them. They want the government to re-open negotiations and repeal its dictat legislation. The government's response is that they will not agree to anything but the imposed contract. They will only allow the unions to negotiate if the employees agree in advance to accept Québec's position.

The public sector has discussed an unlimited general strike since September. The final decision by the Common Front alliance to call for a strike came this weekend.

A series of union meetings started this week. Common Front union locals are meeting to discuss the strike and vote on their own actions — support is expected to be high. At meetings in November an average 60 per cent vote in favour of strike action and in December 85 per cent — responding to the introduction of Bill 70. By January 23 all unions will probably have met.

On Wednesday, Jan. 26, the professional and teaching staffs at CEGEPs will walk out with the school commission teachers.

On Thursday the support staffs in schools and CEGEPs will join them.

On Friday the para-public workers will walk out. This includes Loto-Québec and (wait for it) Liquor commission employees. Employees of community health centres and clinics will also strike.

On the Saturday a mass demonstration is planned, probably for Québec City.

On the Monday hospital staff will walk out. On Tuesday the remaining Common Front employees will join the strike. University sector employees have yet to decide what their participation in the strike will be.

Spot the hypocrites

The rights to strike and negotiate have been enshrined in law by the P.Q. for private sector employers. When they are the employer they negotiate by decree — declaring any strike action illegal. Can a government withdraw a "right" and make it illegal? Even if they can, is it justifiable when they are clearly one of the parties involved in this conflict? Seems they can.

There's a broader strategy behind the impending confrontation that has previously been pointed out in this newspaper. The government of Québec attacks the public sector employees to take the heat off of their own poor economic performance, hoping to gain public support.

What happens now?

General strikes do not usually succeed. In Winnipeg and in Great Britain they brought bitterness and defeat for the union movement.

A general strike is a political challenge to the government. Once begun it will unleash forces that many union leaders may not wish to see played with. Union leaders usually call off general strikes because they aren't prepared to face the consequences of their own actions.

In Québec there was an impromptu general strike in 1972 when the government jailed the leaders of the Common Front. Workers closed whole towns, seized radio stations and established roadblocks on the main highways.

This time the strike will be planned and organised beforehand. The crucial question that remains is the attitude of the private sector workers, members of the same unions as the public sector.

In Saguenay-Lac St. Jean a joint Front has been formed between the public and private sector workers to prepare for the strike. In many cases, however, private sector employees are hostile to the demands of their public sector counterparts.

The government is gearing up for a counter-information campaign which will certainly aim to deepen private-public sector divisions and garner public support for their strategy.

Are the unions prepared to carry through to the bitter end in this strike? They have little choice but to strike, but have they the will to win the strike? "Winning" means defeating the government, even possibly being prepared to replace that government. There's a very fine line there between winning demands and starting a revolution.

About assholes

Finally. The Women's Union is offering the McGill community a mainstream, heterosexual, seemingly apolitical service. Birth control at wholesale prices. No rants about accessibility, effectiveness, side effects, profits at the expense of women's health and lifestyle. No demands for free, safe, effective and accessible, birth control.

And Students' Society is still not happy.

This year the Students' Society Executive has harassed the Women's Union to complacency with their memo expressing discontent with the women's dance and their threats of a smaller office and tighter budget. The Women's Union has held back on political analysis in their information pamphlet in order to assure that the birth control co-op, an important service for 90% of the students on campus, will be set up. But Students' Society is holding it back. Why?

They have offered several reasons. They have proposed that contraceptive devices be sold at profit at Sadies, a rather unreasonable suggestion. The purpose of the co-op is to make birth control devices and information more accessible. People can pay through the nose for contraceptive devices at the local drugstore, without the embarrassment of walking up to the counter at Sadies with a line-up behind, and asking, "May I have a Mars bar, the Times, a package of Players Light, and a diaphragm, please?" Such a service would not do much to reduce the social stigma around birth control and sexuality in general, and it would do nothing to inform people on birth control methods. It is hard to imagine the sales clerk at Sadies pull out Patty Pelvis and explain how to insert the diaphragm properly.

Students' Society has questioned the legality of the project, ignoring the documented proof that it is indeed legal, and offering no evidence that the legality of any aspect of the service is questionable. What they have done is question the reaction of students to the Women's Union running the service, suggesting that pregnant women who have been using contraceptives from the co-op might sue Students' Society — a rather improbable situation, and even if it were to arise, it would be rather easily dealt with.

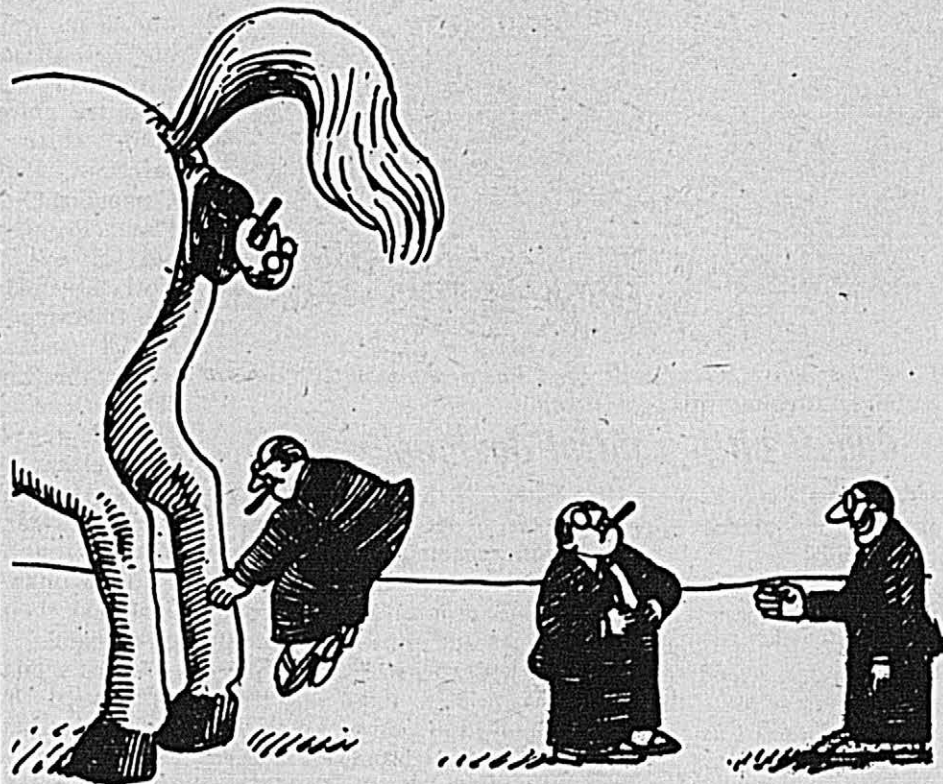

Finally, they have suggested that the co-op would encourage "drunken engineers" to come up and harass Women's Union members. It seems likely that the Plumber's Pot, which has in the past advocated gang rape, genocide, and closing the Women's Union, would be a better catalyst of such activities than wholesale contraceptives, yet that has hardly been of major concern to the Students' Society in the past.

The objections Students' Society has made to the birth control co-op are at best unfounded, at worst ludicrous. But their intervention in the Women's Union activities raises a more fundamentally important question. At what point do organisations funded by Students' Society cease to have control over their own projects and events if they keep within their own and Students' Society's budgetary constraints? The Women's Union set up a project that has almost no drain on their budget, yet Students' Society has seen fit to interfere as if they have a patent on all ideas coming out of clubs to which they allocate funds.

The five men of the Students' Society executive plus Jon Shifman, Comptroller of Finance, are deciding what an organisation of at least 10 times as many women should do for the McGill community. Shifman has been making objections to club activities which have no bearing on the group's finances, his supposed area of concern. He has seen fit to check the reputation of one of the women involved in the co-op project by asking questions about her of her peers and co-workers without her permission. Students' Society appears to want a building full of clubs which act like a collection of Program Boards offering a year-long welcome week. They are discouraging organisations which offer relevant services and raise controversial issues to a supposedly intellectual, thinking community.

Students' Society has repeatedly accused such groups as the South Africa Committee and the Women's Union of not serving the McGill students. Aside from themselves, who do the Students' Society executive and management staff — Bruce Williams, Bruce Hicks, Benjie Trister, Peter Dostikas, Dave Sinyard, Earle Taylor, and Jon Shifman. — serve? Not you.

Ad inconsistency pointed out

To The Daily,

I should like to bring to your attention a slight inconsistency in the Daily's policy.

The Daily has, for some time, and very much to its credit, refused ads from South African companies. I presume this policy is motivated by a distaste for the policy of apartheid and the racial prejudice it implies. It would strike me as self-evident that if the negative characterization of one ethnic group (black South Africans) is deplorable, it is equally deplorable in the case of all groups.

The Daily has, in a number of recent issues (ed. note: last semester), featured an advertisement for a book called "The Official J.A.P. Handbook". The book's cover contains such gems as, "Price $6.00 But for You $5.95", and the promise of an entertaining treatise on "Breaking the Engagement and Keeping the Ring". Other chapters include "Employment: for others, of course", "The Mercedes years", and "Can You Wear Your Mink to College".

Contrary to popular view Jews are not all wealthy, stingy, haggling, pushy and demanding. Nor are Jewish women deservedly the objects of denigration. Jew have as much right to be free of pejorative stereotypes as any other group, and as much right to a sense of personal dignity. The fact that the book was written by a Jewish woman in no way excuses its acceptance as an advertisement. Self-hatred is a common phenomenon amongst groups who have long and unhappy histories, and an intelligent editor should be aware of it. The Jewish American Princess is as much a stereotype as lazy niggers or dumb peeps and should be dispensed with. It is morally odious, socially pernicious and, bluntly, sexist and racist in its consequences.

I trust the Daily will have sufficient sense to drop advertising of this kind.

Murray Smith
M.A. 1 (Phil.)

Ed. note: Thanks to Murray Smith for drawing our attention to the offensive ad material. Our advertising people will be notified and it will be dropped. Sincere apologies for the oversight on our part.

Staying alive in the European theatre

by Greer Nicholson

Governments hope people are sick of opposing the Cruise missile.

But the rapidly growing peace movements refuse to be muzzled. A group of women in England has taken matters into their own hands.

Twenty women are camping "for as long as it takes" at the Greenham Common Royal Air Force Base 50 miles west of London. The base is the planned home for Europe's first 96 Cruise missiles, due to arrive next winter.

There are eight other "peace camps" in England and Scotland, but none has the high visibility of the womens' camp.

Whether we like it or not, the emotional appeal of political action by women guarantees that media moguls are paying attention.

Many of the women are mothers and grandmothers who never thought they would be involved in such highly visible action against the wishes of their elected leaders.

The non-violent protest started in September, 1981. After 15 months, the group is more firm in its resolve than ever.

Last November, 23 women occupied a sentry box inside the main gates to the base. They were arrested and refused to "keep the peace." They spent two weeks in prison.

On December 12, 30 thousand women joined hands around the base at 1 p.m. The next day, 2,000 women blocked the seven gates to the base. Despite superb organisation, two protestors were arrested.

Just before dawn on New Year's Day, 44 women climbed the fence, ran to the silos, joined hands and began singing anti-nuclear songs. After an hour, they were arrested and charged with trespassing.

When they were released on bail on January 4, they returned to their camp outside the base.

The situation is the latest chapter in the particularly strong British peace movement. The Conservative Party under Margaret Thatcher is committed to the Cruise missiles as well as to buying Trident missiles to replace the old Polaris system. Thatcher is pledged to a tough military position against Moscow.

Meanwhile, the Labour Party under Michael Foot wants all nuclear weapons removed from Britain. The Party favours an arms reduction pact with Moscow. At Christmas, Foot took the women at Greenham Common a large Cheddar cheese and pledged his support for their cause.

The Social Democrats usually pursue a compromise position. The nuclear armament issue is no exception.

Britain's leaders are aware that the next general election (late this year or early next year) will be fought, at least partially, on the nuclear question.

Meanwhile, the women at Greenham Common have become a symbol for people who want peace everywhere.

Pictures appear regularly on television and in the newspapers. As they go into their second winter, they are aware of the increasing attention they are attracting. More media space and time than ever before is going into aspects of the arms race and the peace movement.

In the latest Gallup poll, 72 per cent of the British electorate declared itself "worried" about nuclear weapons. A third of the population wanted unilateral nuclear disarmament.

There is growing apprehension in Britain that blindly following American plans could make Western Europe the battleground for nuclear war between the United States and Russia.

In a 1980 British Broadcasting Corporation poll, 87 per cent of people said that they believed there would be a nuclear attack on London in their lifetimes.

As Joan Ruddock of the Coalition for Nuclear Disarmament said on the Greenham Common demonstrators: "It is a fantastic achievement. No-one can claim that they have been stage-managed. It is a spontaneous demonstration by women from all over Britain."

The women at Greenham Common continue their protest.

...citizens inside Québec government computers

The computerised court record system of Québec is an example of a technology used wisely. The public now has access to exact information, and persons involved in active cases can prepare them on the strength of an up-to-date file. By means of display units in court houses, people can quickly have free access to files that concern them.

However, it is becoming much easier for the record-keeping system to affect people than for people to affect the record-keeping system. An individual's control over the use made of data an organization obtains about him is lessening. Is it possible in Québec today to prevent information obtained for one purpose being used for others without her/his consent?

Because the records are strictly confidential, the integrity of data stored in the central file and allegedly, access to this is rigorously controlled. Only duly authorized personnel of the court offices can, through often altered special codes, modify the contents of the records in the central file. Access to information is carefully controlled by codes which identify the user, and give access only to information that the user is authorized to consult.

The court administrator can instantly make the files inaccessible to various users. The original documents used for registering the data are preserved in the court offices and can be made available to users in case of computer breakdown. As an added precaution, a complete copy of the data bank is safeguarded separately, away from the computer.

Crown attorneys have display units where they can consult the list of current records, make a selection and verify the development of cases for which they are responsible. The police may use the system as a tool to summon plaintiffs or witnesses.

The Québec government, through the Bureau des véhicules automobiles, can consult court records of drivers' demerits on the spot when catching them speeding. The Ministère des affaires sociales can get information on separations, divorces, "modifications of matrimonial régimes," etc. Other committees and groups, either working for the provincial government or mandated by it, may be authorized to consult pertinent records.

the system through following files on expropriations, bailiffs' sales to recover taxes, judgements, lawsuits and many others, and are spared the previous tiresome transcription from the files of the court offices. The legal departments of the federal government and the RCMP have direct access to the computer through display units linked to it. Statistics Canada now receives directly, on tape, pertinent data for its reports on the activities of the Canadian judicial system.

The computer system increases order and efficiency in dealings between citizens. Its weakness is at the top. The Minister of Justice, a member of Cabinet, has unrestricted access to all data. How can we be sure that the minister will not use the data for political purposes?

DAILY SPORTSMartlets defend on own turf

by Ace Baker

This year the east is cookin', as you can see by the lineup: Bishops(no.2); Brock(3); Toronto(5); Concordia(6); our Martlets(7); York(8); and unranked Winnipeg and Lakehead.

So how 'bout it? Friday night was game 1 - vs. the high-scoring York Yeowomen. A fast up-and-down first half saw the Martlets take a 43-41 lead. The continued well-balanced McGill attack eventually proved too much for the hogtown rivals, as the red-and-white pulled away to an 85-70 win.

Everyone contributed to the offensive outburst. The stats showed four players in double-figures (Annette Kiss with 28, Annie Constantinides, 18, Linda Marquis, 15, and Sue Butler with 14). The game high 28 pts. from Annette (she don't miss) Kiss included a record-breaking 15 free-throws from the line, on which she was good 14 times. 93% — not bad.

The victory launched the Martlets into the semis, a Saturday match vs. no. 3 Brock University Badgers. Our girls jumped to an early lead with the Currie premier of the off-Broadway 'Annie' show. Yup, the Constantinides kid took charge, quarterbacking the McGill attack, and hitting shots from all over the world. Shanda Franco and Linda Marquis also provided consistent scoring from the perimeter, in a McGill offense that was all guards.

After an even-paced first half, the tide soon began to turn for Brock. Outside shooting is beautiful when you're hot, but you'll live and die by it. Of times when you're tired, the bombs don't drop. It was thus in the second half that the McGill inability to work the ball inside became evident - this was largely due to the outstanding defensive play of Brock and national-team member Candi Lohr, who policed the key in such a manner as to shut down the boards and lane. Annette Kiss managed to scrap n' fight for 12 pts., but that was the extent of the McGill inside game. Annie finished with 19, but even the outside heroics weren't enough, as Brock held a 67-54 lead at the buzzer.

In the other half of the draw, a Concordia win over Toronto, and cliffhanger loss to no.2 Bishops set up a Bishops-Brock final, and McGill-Concordia 3rd place game on Sunday. In our game, a tough first half saw Concordia's Stingers pull away in the final few minutes for a 40-34 lead. The second half belonged to our women, whose more balanced attack was led once again by Annie Constantinides (ya shoulda seen her sports fans, hitting the floor, ripping down those rebounds, snarling at the refs, and 14 pts. besides).

In addition, the usual steady backcourt performance of Linda Marquis (12 pts.) and an improved inside game paced by Annette Kiss (18 pts.) allowed McGill to outscore their rivals in the second half. Yet a pile of late turnovers and failed chances resulted in a comeback that fell short. Final score: Concordia 61, McGill 57.

Which brings us to the final. And what a game it was. Here you have 2 of the top 3 teams in the country going at it for the first time, 3 national-team players on the floor, a capacity crowd at the Currie...here's how it went: Bishops ran up the score in the first half, paced by Andrea Blackwell (whose record 80 pts. for the tourney won her MVP) and Lynne Polson (who you gotta see to believe) -- at halftime it was 37-26 for Bish.

In the second half, Brock wises up and works to get the ball to their ace Candi Lohr, who was held to 2 pts. in the first half. The result was phenomenal - as Bishops continued to score consistently, and as time ticked away, Candi took over.

Incroyable. She accumulated 29 pts. in the second half alone - and the game was anybody's until the final seconds. Yet the consistency and cool-headedness of Bishops has to be admired, as clutch shooting in the end allowed them to hang on for a 66-63 win.
